Though William Blaney Hammond was born in Salisbury, Massachusetts, his family spent a number of years in South Danvers, leaving their mark upon the town.

William was the fourth child and oldest son of Edward and Nancy (Blaney) Hammond. He was born on Sept. 13, 1834. His parents were married in Marblehead in 1827 and remained there during the early years of their marriage. By 1840, they had settled in Danvers, where Edward worked as a painter, though the town census referred to him as a restorator.

Many of their family resided in nearby Lynn, which accounts for the fact that the births of their last three children occurred in that city.

It is unfortunate that our high school did not open its doors until 1850, because William would have enjoyed the challenge. What education he did receive was put to good use when he went to work for local newspapers as a printer.

His first years in the business were in the office of the Salem Gazette. After a disagreement there, he "quit work on account of dissatisfaction with a two-faced foreman." [W. B. Hammond journal, Sept. 10. 1857] Shortly after, he went to work for his cousin Stephen Blaney and also for Lewis W. Elliott. In 1859, he accepted a position at the South Danvers Wizard.

His work at the Wizard earned him the friendship and respect of both Charles D. Howard, the publisher, and Fitch Poole, the editor.

More importantly for William, his new position gave him the stability to offer marriage to the woman he loved, Georgiana Staples of Haverhill.

When the war began, William did not enlist at once. Perhaps he thought, as just about everyone else did, that it would soon be over. More likely, he didn't want to leave his new wife and baby daughter, Susie, so soon after her birth. By the end of the summer of 1861, it became clear that the war would not be dealt with as quickly as many hoped. And despite Susie only being six months old, William joined the 24th Massachusetts Infantry on Oct. 9 as a private. He served in that regiment for three years, fighting in numerous engagements, including the Battles at Roanoke Island, Secessionville, Fort Wagner and the Siege at Petersburg. During his three years of service, he became one of the Wizard's most regular contributors.

Upon his return to South Danvers, he once again set to work as a printer. After his wife's death, though, he moved to Georgetown where he met his second wife, Mary L. DeWolfe. They married and in 1879 had a daughter Bessie. William went on to found the Georgetown Advocate which he published until his death in 1895.
